After reading severar magazine articles on canning chicken, I am impelled that in a large fraction of the cases it is A Tasty Chicken Tale. to give my own experience. wise. The ex-legislator who brings We raise our own chickens, and in the home as a souvenir his bulky file of fall select those we intend keeping documents of the session, has in them through the winter, and shut the others evidence of the good work done by the up for about ten days, keeping food always before them; they have no food for twelve hours before killing, but always plenty of clean water to drink. It is one of my pet theories that won- old places as if only a few days had ders can be accomplished with everyday passed since she had been there. things, a theory that I have had to put into practice often in order to make my eurroundings livable for myself, and pleasing to my friends. I had special need of it when I moved into that house It seemed utterly commonplace, and simply hopeless. There was a bideous porch; distinction and dignity were wholly lacking; it was dingy, unattractive and neglected looking when we moved into it. Not picturesquely neglected or romantically weatherbeaten, but just common and hopeless, almost apologetic among its more distinctive-looking neighbor houses. To me it looked almost pleading—that settled me. It seemed to say to me, "Make me what you will, I have been waiting for you s

That was what I saw when the Man and I inspected the house. He saw only the commonplace, and almost disreputable house. "A good neighborhood, to be sure, but how did that thing get here?" said he to me. "Let's look at it," I suggested. "What can you see in that thing?" he queried, for he knew I was always seeing things.
We looked at it, and found there were just two things in favor of it. One, I have already mentioned, was the neighborhood, and the other was the price, it was absurdly cheap. Well, we bought it. We studied it while, and then we transformed it. We ripped off the bideous porch, and re-placed it by a quaint colonial doorway with a brass knocker. We made gay ittle window boxes, with red geraniums in summer, and little perky evergreens in winter. We laid a brick floor before the doorway, and gave it the gracious effect of a terrace.

At the side we made a pergola-like sun porch with a brick floor, and builtn seats along the sides. Quick-growing lines made this very summery looking, and gave it charm and us seclusion. We ave the house a coat of white paint, nd after the vines had grown, and the lowers were all in bloom, and we sat out amid the cool seclusion of our screened in pergols, and as the admiring com ments of passers-by floated in to us, now and then, we felt that we had achieved

The interior received its rejuvenating we restored old-time beauty by applying machine, engine and separator. We cut a wide doorway and placed some French doors to give light to a dark room, and also to enable us to throw two rooms into one if so desired. Oh, how we worked and schemed to make that place over—to make it beautiful. The joy we had in transforming the place, and the fun we had. Making that house over was for me more fun than anything I had done for years, and when it was done I felt as If it were ours in more than the sense of possession—it was ours because it reflected our per-

On "Passing Over the Article." During this month the citizens of ou country towns are extensively engaged in the great indoor New England pas-time of "passing over the article." The matter is here commented upon from the parliamentary point of view, and not upon the merits of the question as to whether passing over the article is wis or proper. That depends upon the arti-
